Article published on January 16th 2012 | Business

Accounting stock control and stock management are two important aspects for any enterprise or manufacturing industry. Why? If an industry piles up excessive stock than required, it would simply tie up the financial resources unnecessarily for long period of time. This will ultimately cause loss to the business. On the other hand, if it has stock less than the required limit, it can hamper its growth and sustainability. Either of these situations is harmful for commercial enterprise, which is why it is very necessary to have stock control, regardless of the business size.

What is Stock Control?

It can be defined as number of practices, policies and procedures followed for inventory management. It is very important that it should be consistent with pre-determined standards of services offered by the business. If it is not inconsistent, then chances are that business unit has to lose its goodwill, which is very important for making business, a success. Manual methods of controlling inventory are also not much useful, as the entrepreneurs had to face several problems when these methods were implemented.

On Neglecting Stock Control

One who ignores the importance of stock control and stock management will have to face several problems in the long run. When you ignore this factor, it often leads to hindrance in cash flow with disproportionate supply of inventory and you are not able to fulfil the needs of potential customers with insufficient supply. In either of these two cases, a business is in total loss and has to face the risk of its stability.

Benefits of POS system for Managing Inventory

It is a known fact that manual control for managing inventory requires lots of efforts, money and time. You can make use of an efficient POS system, which can prove beneficial for managing stock. If you combine inventory control system with POS technology, then it will increase your staff efficiency in a great way.

With this system, you can save money and handle stock management with much ease and in a great way. When compared with manual control methods, it consumes less time, is easy to maintain and also save you lots of money. Another benefit of this system is that it can provide assistance to your staff to reply customer queries with much efficiency.
