Why would I need a marketing consultant by Julia Roger

Article published on March 6th 2012 | Business

You may or may not have come across a marketing consultant before but one thing is for certain â€“ they are rarely short of work. Firms across a diverse range of industries regularly make use of professionals who can maximise profitability by helping improve how a company promotes its products to potential customers. Here are just a few reasons why so many people take advantage of the services a marketing consultant has to offer:

A marketing consultant usually has substantial industry experience and no shortage of expertise. They usually have plenty of high profile projects under their belt and could therefore bring you skills honed by hands-on training. In other words a marketing consultant is a worthwhile investment as they bring a marketing nous to the table which is based on empirical knowledge and practical assistance.

The help a marketing consultant can give you includes identifying your target market and tailoring your approach appropriately. Things such as establishing the demographic you want to sell to and how they live their lives is an important first step. All sorts of aspects of the marketing mix then come up for consideration. An experienced marketing consultant will be able to select the most fruitful advertising channels â€“ be that radio, television or new media outlets â€“ as well as thing like pricing strategies. The latter involves things like creaming (a high introductory price) or market penetration (a low introductory price) and so on.

The role of marketing consultant is all about maximising the return on a marketing investment. Sometimes it is not about how much you spend; it is about defining your role in the marketplace accurately and targeting your campaign in the right way.
