Future Entrepreneurs Enroll in a Masters Degree in Management by DJ Willis

Article published on January 11th 2012 | College

Why

One of the things that lots of managers don't possess are management skills. It isn't something which is a snap to learn at school. For instance, virtually all business degrees focus on areas of business which don't have much to do with management, such as accounting. Then again, a person looking to gain management skills can study them in a master management program.

With this graduate program, the main focus will be on management skills. As an alternative for taking irrelevant accounting courses that can be mandatory in a business administration degree, the classes will be on understanding management skills such as human resources, leadership coaching and project management. It is a much more hands-on type of degree program that many other graduate business degrees.

Admissions

You should note that the master management program is a graduate degree. For that reason, a previous undergraduate degree is going to be required. This usually means a four year baccalaureate degree is necessary in order to gain admissions. Even so, just receiving the necessary undergraduate degree isn't enough.

In addition, potential students to this particular program will need to earn a competitive GPA in their undergraduate program. This means a GPA that is at least 2.5 to 3.0 will be important in order to gain admission to many programs. You need to realize that this requirement is widespread since a graduate student goes on academic probation for a GPA below 3.0, and a master's degree can't be earned with a GPA below 3.0.

Coursework

The common type of coursework in a master management program was made to develop management skills. They'll involve controlling either resources or people.Therefore students don't need to take classes like accounting, economics, or business law. Even so, some schools might have concentrations that touch on these areas, even though they don't teach management skills.

Typically, the classes in the masters program will be about leadership skills, managing projects, project risks, human resources, compensation management, and other similar classes. Like other business degree programs, there's usually a capstone project class at the end to show what was mastered through the degree program.

Career

Scholars who graduate from a master management program will face much better job prospects than those without a graduate business degree. In many places, a graduate business degree is going to be required in order to gain a promotion to the management ranks. Human resources won't move a resume through without a graduate business management degree, no matter how qualified the applicant is. Essentially, this type of master's degree will help break a glass ceiling while teaching useful management skills that will be helpful once a person gets into management.

The wages in the management ranks should be higher. In many instances, they're substantially higher than those in non-supervisory or other non-management roles. This is a great graduate program choice for individual contributors who want to leap to the next level of their career progression.

Article Source:
http://www.articleside.com/college-articles/future-entrepreneurs-enroll-in-a-masters-degree-in-management.htm - Article Side

DJ Willis - About Author:
If you are interested in finding out more information about getting a management information systems degree or a master management degree then you have come to the right place. a bellevue.edu can provide you with the information that you are looking for and help you jump start your education. Stop wasting time and start thinking about your future and find out what Bellevue University can do for you.

Article Keywords:
education, higher education, online education

You can find more free articles on Article Side. Sign up today and share your knowledge to the community! It is completely FREE!