All graduate management degrees are not necessarily termed MBA. Some might be referred to as master of Business Studies or graduated business administration to name a couple. Just because the degree is not called MBA. Does not necessarily mean it's not what you are looking for. The MBA is a professional degree intended for those who want to pursue a degree in business, management, and administration in order to succeed at an executive level.

The MBA compresses all the skills needed to succeed in business, and it permits you to do so in a short period of time. It represents the knowledge and the skills an employee may obtain over the course of many years if he or she is fortunate enough to have interdisciplinary exposure finance management, information systems. The degree is pervasive amongst all industries spanning the medical, governmental, academic, and financial worlds. Since its inception, there has been no standard to the degree; there are many different types of MBA programs which vary in length, curriculum, and ideology.

If you are looking for a degree that will focus on one specific field, perhaps the MBA is not the right program for you, many new masters programs are being developed in specialized fields such as International Business, Business Economics, and Information Systems. These are usually one year. Full time degrees that do not necessarily have the same standing as an MBA degree.

More traditional master's programs, such as those in economics or finance, may be well suited for the candidate looking for access into very specialized technical or academic fields, to date, though the MBA is the most renowned and accepted degree for those looking to acquire a well-rounded management background. Later we will discuss different master's program concentrations available that allow students to gain additional depth in their specific area of interest.

The idea for masters of business administration degree was first considered. The MBA designation was intended to provide practical hands on skills and theoretical experience for the upcoming management elite. The degree caught on rapidly and history has proven the MBA as an excellent long term investment for students as well as their employers.

The degree is now so pervasive that currently hundreds of thousands of candidates apply to programs each year. As new programs are being introduced to facilitate attaining the degree, such as Internet degrees and shortened programs, this number is on the rise. Although more and more people are able to reap the benefits and status of an Online MBA program the competition is getting steeper as more candidates apply for a limited number of spots. Consequently, there has been tremendous growth in less selective programs and open enrollment MBA programs, as well as programs from online universities.

The birth of internet based programs. The acceptance of such a degree is now widespread many programs have earned regional accreditation and recognition amongst employers who not only approve tuition reimbursement but also value the initiative and maturity of a candidate able to demonstrate the motivation to pursue such a program.
