Though almost everyone owns a cell phone, we still find the landline phones in almost every home in the U.S. This means people have not overlooked the drawbacks of landline phones yet. In fact, the landline phones outsmart the cell phone in a few areas. The main reason why most people prefer the cell phones to the landline phones is due to the fact that the former is portable and easy-to-use than the latter. They are light-weight and user-friendly when compared to the immobile home phones. Add to that, the additional features like high quality camera, gaming applications, text messaging, access to the Internet and music players have all made the cell phones a charm among the users.

However, the landline phone outsmarts the cell phones in a few areas as mentioned below.

Battery life

This is one of the main differences between the cell phone and the landline phone. As we all know, the battery in the home phones is offered to us by the phone set provider itself. In these batteries the electricity is generated through the copper phone lines that are buried underground. Therefore, there is always a constant supply of charge and you donâ€™t have to worry about the landline phoneâ€™s battery dying out. If you take the case of a cell phone, there is always the possibility of the battery dying out very fast when the usage is a bit more like that of playing music or games. When there is a power outage and you need to make an emergency call you have to face the most frustrating thing of having to wait for the power to be restored to make the call or pull the number out from the cell phone directory.

Security concerns and additional benefits

Security is one of the major issues with the cell phones. Anytime your cell phone conversations can be hacked and misused. This is very rare in case of the landline phones. It is for this reason why they are predominantly used for office purposes. Some of the additional benefits of the home phones include access to the Internet for DSL subscribers, connection to other equipments like fax machines, DVR and a lot more.
