How to Achieve Patient Satisfaction in Hospital and Indicators to Check by James Blee

Article published on April 19th 2012 | Customer Service

There are many indicators that point to the patient satisfaction in hospital, which will give the staff and the authorities an excellent idea of what the satisfaction levels are. The results of surveys across various departments such as day surgery care, inpatient care, outpatient care and emergency care provide a lot of data for those looking at them, indicating to changes that might be needed. This is why, some hospitals follow some well-considered principals which tend to respond to or prevent some of the indicators of hospital patient satisfaction. For example, the belief amongst staff in top hospitals is that patient satisfaction is not by coincidence and it happens when the staff is aware of it at all times.

Highly professional staff usually participates in clear agreements and courageous conversations keeping in mind the happiness of the patient and trying to lower the anxiety levels as much as possible. Moreover, satisfaction amongst patients has been largely associated with how caring the staff is with the patients as that helps in recuperating faster. .

A very important aspect that forms the backbone of patient satisfaction is the hospital culture itself. Hospitals which feel commercialized almost always lag behind those healthcare centers where the culture promotes better care of patients and better response to their anxieties from the hospital staff. Standardization of certain set processes for example is very important to promote the level of patient satisfaction that is achieved. Some analysis can also tell which of the cultural aspects of a hospital enhance the satisfaction levels and which ones need some change in orientation so that the patient can feel more cared for. There are high impact services and skill training which are followed in certain hospitals as a long term strategy to enhance patient satisfaction.
