Corporate Retreats and Wedding Receptions made Easier with Denver Event Centers by Monica Bremer

Article published on February 9th 2012 | Destinations

When you put company retreats, wedding functions, and ballrooms in one box, what do you get? Simple: you get the need for a sizable floor area where hundreds of visitors can enjoy the food and fun such occasions bring. This is because celebrations in general have one thing alike: a huge volume of attendees including the celebrant and event crew. One is okay, two is a party, and three is a crowd, but four or more attendees may need an event center.

As the coordinator of a particular event, you would not wish any acquaintance of yours to be excluded from all the fun. Before long, you ask yourself where to accommodate hundreds of guests in one place at any given time. You want a huge floor area for the invitees to move around, besides a place for the smorgasbord table, stage, tables and chairs, and other party favors. In party planning, floor area means everything.

The following cases to be mentioned later require a big venue not only due to the huge number of invitees, but also because they have to move. Give anyone a few square feet of room, say no more than 12 square feet, and that should be enough. Don't forget to check your guest list frequently so you can account for the space to be reserved with the number of attendees in mind. The most vital thing is that they do not become unruly, thus increasing the chances of somebody getting hurt.

Ballroom. If your guests are likely to dance the night away, the space has to be big enough to set aside adequate room for a ballroom floor. Also, considering that the type of ballroom Denver CO partygoers use typically involves dancing as a pair, they need elbow room even more. Remember that couples need a minimum of nine square feet, and not everybody will be dancing at the same time. In this case, you do not have to take account of the overall dance floor area for the total number of guests.
