Donana National Park by Alissha Johnson

Article published on July 9th 2012 | Destinations

Spain is a country blessed with natural beauty. There are many natural parks in Spain for the same reasons and they are well maintained by the authorities. The largest national park in Spain is located in the region of AndalucÃ-a. It is named as Donana National Park and it is considered among the highly important parks of the world for the same reasons.

AndalucÃ-a is the best region of Spain when it comes to places and areas of interest. There is Costa del Sol and the dry mountains located in this region. There are diverse landscapes, historical places, desert, valleys and mountains present in this region. This region comprises of around 17% of the total territory of Spain. It is the largest region having the best standard of life in Spain. That is the same reason the largest national park of Spain is located in this region.

The total area of Donana National Park is around 50,000 hectares. This park is located in few provinces of Southern Spain that fall in the region of Andalusia. The climate in the park is mild and for the same reasons it is an ideal place for wildlife and plant life. This park is protected by the authorities and itâ€™s open for enjoyments only. There are many visitors that head towards this park for the purpose of camping, for enjoying beach life and for recreational activities.

There are many bird watching locations in this park. There are cycling routes and walking paths in this park for the facilitation of visitors. Similarly there are information centers in the park for visitors. There are natural waterways and pine trees within the park that look fabulous. There are many people that stay in the towns and villages around this park in order to have great views of the natural wildlife that is present in the park.

This park was created in the year 1969. It was declared a world heritage site by UNESCO in the year 1994. This park was a royal hunting place in the twentieth century before its creation. For the same reasons it captured the interest of the government of Spain ever since. The best way to explore this park in a short span of time is by getting a ride on the boat that moves from Sanlucar de Barranmeda. The boat stops at two places showing most parts of the park to the people riding on it.
