Find an Experienced Philadelphia Personal Injury Attorney for Successful Settlements by Hank Aaron

When large commercial trucks collide with smaller pick-up trucks, cars, or motorcycles, the results can be catastrophic. Generally, the driver and any passengers of the smaller vehicle sustain the most damage and injuries. This is because semis and tractor-trailers can weigh upwards of 80,000 pounds – typically no match for a smaller vehicle. In addition, the cargo of the truck can potentially cause secondary injuries. For example, a semi hauling a flammable liquid poses extra risk in a collision. When these accidents are caused by negligence on the part of the truck driver, or due to lax safety regulations on the part of the trucking company, the injured party may be entitled to recover damages from the responsible parties.

A Philadelphia personal injury attorney can help you or your loved one file a legal claim against the trucking company. He or she will work with you to establish the details of the case and estimate a possible compensation based on your emotional, physical, and/or financial damages. This is a difficult task, in that several of your injuries may be intangible – making it very difficult to assign a proper dollar amount. However, an experienced Philadelphia truck car accident lawyer has gone through this process many times before and will be able to provide invaluable insight.

In addition, a Philadelphia truck car accident lawyer will know the full extent of the federal regulations and standards that commercial trucks are held accountable to. (A less experienced Philadelphia personal injury attorney may not be aware of these additional regulations.) Because these cases are sometimes settled out of court, you™ll want to hire a Philadelphia truck car accident lawyer who is equally skilled in the courtroom as he/she is at negotiations.

You can contact the Law Offices of Robert W. Sink for a free consultation regarding your truck accident cases.
