Take some of the pain out of divorce by Julia Roger

Article published on January 9th 2012 | Divorce

“Till death do us part”...words that are nearly always said with the best of intentions, but which don’t always come true. Divorce is a common part of life in Britain today, with around 50 per cent of marriages ending in divorce. With emotions running high and valuable assets at stake, divorce can be expensive, lengthy and, of course, extremely upsetting for all involved. If you’re going through a divorce, you will need to employ the services of legally trained professionals, who will guide you through the legal process, protecting your interests and assets.

Divorce is recognised as one of the most stressful period in anyone’s life and the average divorce in the UK takes nearly 18 months to finalise. That’s 18 months of living in limbo, and in some painful cases, reliving the past and being unable to move on. It’s also 18 months of legal fees that help to drain anyone’s finances. It’s no wonder more and more people are turning to “quickie” divorce – simple, cheap and fast divorce. A quickie divorce could be right for you if you and your partner agree on the terms of the divorce; that is you agree on custody of children and how you are going to distribute your assets, including the family home. A quickie divorce means no court appearances and minimal stress, leaving you free to start living your life again.

Whether you are going through a “quickie” divorce or a potentially acrimonious divorce, a prescribed legal procedure will need to be followed. To start divorce procedures, you must have been married for at least a year. You must also be able to show that the marriage has irretrievably broken down. To show this breakdown of marriage, you have to choose one of the grounds for divorce. Divorce grounds include adultery, unreasonable behaviour, a separation period which meets the law’s requirements or desertion. Unreasonable behaviour is one of the most popular grounds for divorce in England and Wales.
