At only two years a boy is as smart as Einstein. by Anne James

Article published on February 20th 2012 | Education

A boyâ€™s IQ score of only two years and five months is comparable to Albert Einsteinâ€™s IQ of 160 points, being the youngest member of Mensa group in Britain, which not only accepts people with an IQ above 148.

Oscar Wrigley started talking at nine months and 18 months, already knew all alphabetâ€™s letters. Up to fulfill two years, already had a vocabulary of thousands of words, while a "normal" child knows only about 50 words, tells the Daily News.

"Recently, Oscar explains to my wife how reproduction works in penguins," said stunned father, obviously, an IT specialist of Reading, in Berkshire.

Neither he nor his wife havenâ€™t an IQ above average, but an uncle of the child showed a similar intelligence, going to college just at 13 years.

According to Dr Peter Congdon, of the Center for Gifted Children in Solihull, Oscar's intelligence is beyond the possibilities of testing, given that Stanford - Binet test canâ€™t measure an IQ over 160. Such a score is issued once a hundred thousand people.

Currently, the biggest problem for small "Einstein" and his parents is education. His mother hopes it can enroll in school at least two years before the legal age.

The youngest child of Mensa is a girl, Elise Tan Roberts, from Edmonton, north London, which in two years, four months and 14 days, has an IQ of 154 points.
