Apart from academics we let our children to learn dance, music and art world. If it is a boy child, then we prefer introducing him with the sports world. A very few of the parents think of the other extracurricular activities such as Karate. Many of the parents think that teaching karate to the kids will make them aggressive. However, it is just the opposite of what they think. Karate has many positive sides, and it is a wise idea to train the kids with karate skills.

Karate is a form of martial art that evolved in the Ryukyu Islands which is now called Okinawa, Japan. The concept of karate came up partially from original fighting methods which called Te and from Chinese kenpō. Karate is an outstanding art that involves punching, kicking, strikes of knee and elbow, and helpful techniques like knife-hands. Styles such as grappling, throws, restraints, locks, and vital point strikes are basically taught. One who practices karate is called a karateka.

Karate helps to build self-control among the children. Most of the children are found to be lacking of self-control. Parents should provide those kids with the teaching of karate. With regular practice of karate, children can lessen their aggressive attitude. It also helps to enhance the level of concentration among children. The martial art, especially the style of Kyokushin karate helps to develop the co-ordination by the repetitive utilization of the motor skills of the body. It helps to increase strength, flexibility and balance in the body. Over all, the practice of karate trains life skills.

This skill helps in the process of building blocks of good personality and leadership. Karate can be practiced by people of any age, but basically, it is good for kids, as this helps them to be able to learn the life skills early in their growth, and also taking on a strong manner of being energetic. It creates a well-built base for a cheerful healthy individual. Earlier, parents used to admit their kids in karate schools, but now even formal schools also provide their students with the facility of teaching karate. It helps the children to save time which they would have to spare if they would go to the karate schools after their formal school.
