Article published on February 13th 2012 | Education

Some college students may have a pre-conceived notion of accounting that consists of a frazzled person sitting at a desk all day long working with papers filled with numbers. But accounting is an integral part of a company and an accountant is actually someone in the business field who aids a business or organization in tracking financial resources. As a student who may be making the choice to purse an accounting degree, Akron Ohio is an ideal location for studying not only the primary accounting subjects, but also for learning valuable skills that will aid you in completing the degree program and in your life after college.

What Do Accounting Majors Study?

An accounting degree requires a willingness to learn about new topics, procedures, policies and accounting technology. A degree in accounting focuses on more than just basic math skills and formulas. Students must also know how to follow strict procedures and know the various recordkeeping laws or reporting requirements. In a way, as you learn the ins and outs of the major, you'll discover that the field is not as closely related to math as you originally thought. Math is important, of course, but so are a lot of other critical and analytical thinking skills.

Types of Accounting Degrees

For most Ohio residents who take the leap and decide to pursue an accounting degree, Akron is a suitable location in which to study. Earning a bachelor's degree demonstrates that you have mastered basic accounting practices, procedures, laws on recordkeeping and the basic reporting requirements for a business.

A master's degree in accounting is often sought after an individual successfully obtains their bachelor's degree, and usually happens a few years into their career. A master's degree program is more rigorous and in-depth than a bachelor's degree program and delves further into the advanced concepts of the accounting field. Post-Bachelor's coursework requires more hands-on application of new Accounting technology and financial concepts than a bachelor's degree.

The time commitment and financial obligation of any degree program should be kept in mind when Akron students consider enrolling in an accounting degree program so that they can properly plan ahead for the time commitment the degree requires along with balancing life's other responsibilities such as work and family.
