Denver Students Undecided on a Major? Choose Criminal Justice by William Hauselberg

Article published on February 10th 2012 | Education

Despite the pressure college students may feel, itâ€™s not a crime to be undecided when choosing a college major. In Denver, a number of college courses are designed to offer students a wealth of information on criminality, as well as how the state criminal justice system works on the whole. Whether youâ€™re thinking about attending college or youâ€™re already there, taking a closer look at criminal justice degree programs facilitated by Denver universities may put you right where you want to be.

Where Do I Begin?

Most colleges require students take a specific number of courses in their major, as well as courses in general education. Aside from general education curriculum, there are a number of interrelated courses that can compliment a criminal justice major such as introductory classes in psychology and sociology. Understanding the mental and social aspects of behavior can help college students realize that the criminal justice system extends beyond the law and order proceedings of todayâ€™s society. Completing these types of courses at the onset of a criminal justice degree program can provide a springboard for upcoming coursework that will require critical assessment abilities.

What will I Learn?

Introductory criminal justice courses offer broad overviews of crime and justice in America, as well as higher schools of thought regarding the commission of crime itself, punishment, delinquency, ethics, sentencing and appeals, prison life, career criminals, and forecasting what lies ahead for the American justice system. Typically, subsequent midlevel courses will cover Criminal Law, Juvenile Justice and Delinquency, Criminal Justice and the Social Structure, and Criminology Theories. Higher level undergraduate classes offer insight concerning correctional institutions and how they serve society on multifaceted levels. In addition, students may be able to learn about terrorism, cyber crimes, policing the internet, and the investigative tools used for surveillance to gather data. Above all else, criminal justice majors will take this information and apply codes of ethics to the abovementioned disciplines.

As crime becomes more and more prevalent across the country, it only stands to reason that a number of criminal justice degree programs fill up quickly at Denver universities. Post-graduate degrees may also be an option for those students who want to immerse themselves in a field that is constantly evolving and keeping pace with modern societal laws.
