Article Side

Dissertation Results Chapter â€“ a Perfect Understanding of Structure and Section Organization by Donna Santos

Article published on December 7th 2011 | Education

Thesis is another name for a ghost for every doctorate student is this statement true for you?

Is argumentative chapter of a dissertation that scary?

Well, not anymore

Once you are done with the literature review and thesis methodology section, your next task would be the outcomes section. In this section you have to go through all of your findings and state the outcomes of those findings. You cannot give your own opinion on the matter; you have to give straight facts and figures.

A thesis outcomes section is a medium for an apparent presentation of the outcomes of reading and researching, for the writer is judgment of what the description end product might be. When it comes to the point of delivering and holding forth your thesis argument outcomes, you may be a little bewildered how to accomplish this and so many of us are when we first attempt it. You should prepare what you want to look over in this section and more considerably, what you want to classify as major outcomes, forms and heart of the key research information you have collected.

Structure and organization of the section:

As usual, The Thesis Outcomes section will start with an introduction, in which you should discuss the section of thesis writing and its structure in a very brief manner. You should also mention your literature review and repeat briefly what you found in it, so that you can make some comments on them. You have to evaluate the outcomes of your investigation, discuss them and then write your conclusion.

As to the organization of the Thesis Outcomes section, it is better to arrange the information according to the theme of the thesis, following the example of the Literature Review.

Outcome can be of two types: quantitative and qualitative. The first sort of outcome includes all kinds of statistical data, testing and graphs. To estimate these outcomes correctly, you have to go behind the research question of thesis writing to see how your outcomes assist with the optional premise. In a quantitative study, the discussion begins with a brief portrayal of the sample.

Qualitative outcomes generally embody a synopsis of the most significant conclusive writing, and provide a scrutiny of them. These have no statistics to present, and it relies solely on literature review.

Sometimes the consequences and argument are collectively written in one section; but in general, the outcomes, the discussion and the conclusion are written separately in different sections. This facilitates a constant flow of information.

Conclusion:

Dissertation results chapter is not that hard as you thought it might be. Do not repeat in dreary writing style what is noticeable for a well informed reader or examiner to see at a quick look. The thesis advisor usually has a belief about the point of detail needed in this section.

Article Source:
http://www.articleside.com/education-articles/dissertation-results-chapter-a-perfect-understanding-of-structure-and-section-organization.htm - Article Side

Donna Santos - About Author:
Donna Santos is a senior research writer and provides help for a Chapter of a dissertation and a Dissertation results chapter.Feel free to contact for any sort of help in this regard.

Article Keywords:
Chapter of a dissertation, Dissertation results chapter

You can find more free articles on Article Side. Sign up today and share your knowledge to the community! It is completely FREE!