We watch Television mostly in our leisure time. There are many people who watch TV because they are addicted to it. However, Children watch TV because they find pleasure from it. Parents also let their kids watch TV when they ask for it. They do not realize that it can also leave negative impact on them. Despite of the fact that, TV is a medium of entertainment, but it is also true that it leaves violent impact on children. Over the last thirty years, pediatricians, scientists and child researchers in many countries have done studies in which it has been tried to find out that television violence makes a big influence on manner children behave.

Once Television researchers, Bandura and Ross made a research to get at the fact regarding the effects of TV violence on kids. They made the study successful by splitting some children into two groups, A and B. Group A kids were shown a violent video tape in which a small girl was shown acting harshly with a doll. Whereas, Group B kids were shown a video in which a kid was playing pleasantly with a doll. Later on when they experimented, they kept the Group A children in a room alone with the same copy of the doll that had been used in the video. Kids in Group A reacted by hitting, punching and kicking the doll and acted violently.

The Group B children were also kept in a room alone with the doll, but it was astonishing to see that they played very calmly with it. In Television programmes, it is often shown that heroes commit crimes but they do not get punished. Kids think that if they imitate the criminal, they will be an idol, as well. The hero that commits the crime is normally shown fascinating. However, there is nothing brave about aggression and it is completely incorrect to show children such programmes. Kids start on thinking about criminals as influential role models.

Television is a dominant medium of entertainment, which means it almost make people believe in what they see.
