Learn How to Write Dissertation Methodology chapter in 9 Easy Steps by Donna Santos

Article published on January 24th 2012 | Education

If every student is provided a mini guide of thesis writing, its constitution would become very easier, right?

Following is a miniature guide for writing the methodology chapter of thesis.

In a separate chapter of your thesis you will write in detail about your topic, and how you are going to collect information relating to the topic. This chapter is the dissertation methodology chapter and should consist of about 200 300 words. It depends on the type of thesis you are writing, but here is the general idea of its content:

1.Basically, in this chapter you have to gain the trust of the reader. You will explain your topic, and tell the reader why you have chosen this particular topic and how it became a fragment of your interest. Then you will explain the method of your research, telling the reader how you are going to collect the information required for the thesis. Explain why this particular method is best suitable for your topic, and how it relates to the field of research you are interested in.

2.If possible, you can provide information or reference from some other researcher. This will give diversity to your research and the reader will gain more enthusiasm in your topic.

3.While selecting your method of research, you must take extra care. The procedure must relate to your studies in every aspect. The procedure of finding information depends on your dissertation question basically. For instance, you have chosen a topic that is entirely new and no research has been made on it before, in this case your research procedure would be exploratory.

4.In this chapter you will gain the trust of the reader by explaining him how you have collected your information, and how the sources of your data are reliable. You will also mention references for your material.

5.Where necessary you will mention your calculations, techniques, facts, and all the statistics. This increases the credibility of your extended essay and makes it more readable.

6.Mention how much of the content is based on your assumptions and how much on facts. If you write this section creatively, the reader will not only understand your approach to the topic, but will also be able to relate to the factual data.

7.Make sure that your research is only about one aspect of the topic. Do not try to cover all the questions, just concentrate on any one path so that the reader is not confused between the concepts and you get more space to explain yourself freely.

8.The content of the chapter should be written in your own words. The reader must not feel that he has read this content before, it should be written in your own words and in a unique way of presenting.

9.If there are participants in your dissertation, people who helped in collecting the required information, then you must mention them too. Tell the reader how they have contributed in the making of your thesis.

Many students do not know how to write dissertation methodology chapter, and some of them are too shy to consult their professors for it. In this case, an easy guide becomes the guiding angel for the student.

Article Source:
http://www.articleside.com/education-articles/learn-how-to-write-dissertation-methodology-chapter-in-9-easy-steps.htm - Article Side

Donna Santos - About Author:
Donna Santos is a senior research writer and provides help for a how to write dissertation methodology and a dissertation methodology.Feel free to contact for any sort of help in this regard.

Article Keywords:
how to write dissertation methodology, dissertation methodology

You can find more free articles on Article Side. Sign up today and share your knowledge to the community! It is completely FREE!