PMP Certification: Earn a Confidence First by Terro White

Article published on December 3rd 2011 | Education

The value of PMP certification is well known. To have it is valuable. To think of having it is challenging. The scale to evaluate your skills and knowledge is fair and transparent, and the reputed PMI itself doesnâ€™t ask for any PMP certification training. It is those on their way to take part in this tough exam and its challenges to come out in flying colors.

And it is natural when your skills, knowledge and competence are to be tested only in four hours. You earn knowledge through various books, lectures, and most importantly through your experience of years designing various projectsâ€”but you have to pour all this into the choices of merely 200 questions!

The questions are obviously going to be tough, demanding you to grill your nerves thoroughly to come to the most relevant option. The job of project management is quite involving, you know. You donâ€™t work on improving projects only on office table. You do it in your brain, and practically you may have lots of time to consider and reconsider various options available.

Your experience in your particular niche helps you greatly. But when you have to attempt the questions from as varied fields as possible, you really need to perform your best. And if you have to become a reputed professional having the PMP certification in your hands, you have to secure at least 60 percent marks in the test.

The exam for PMP certification covers areas like initiation of a project, its planning, execution, controlling and monitoring. It will also cover closing of a project as well as professional and social responsibility. The exam is based on the resources of PMBoKâ€”the project management body of knowledge. It covers nine areas of knowledge, five groups of processes, about 44 distinct processes that are further divided into tools, inputs and outputs. Thus the exam requires you bring out your best talent and expertise.

But these are not only sufficient for fighting the exam. You are better off with some handy tools and tips. You need to memorize a lot, and a concisely designed revision of the subject matter. If you opt for a preparatory course for the exam â€“ and it is sincerely recommendedâ€”you will find your skills and knowledge are finely brushed up. This will certainly refresh you for your next projects. As far as exam is concerned, you need to earn a confidence first. It is more so because apart from being emb arrassing, a failure proves to be costly as wellâ€”to take part in the test is highly expensive.

There are numerous institutes offering you a training and preparation for the exam throughout the US. Many of them have their scores of branches throughout the US. States like Virginia are hub for such institutes.

Virginia PMP training revises your knowledge in project quality, time management, scope and risks with a project, human resource and costs involved. You also revisit strategies to procure resources, and those about communications and integration. On the one hand the exam covers the widest possible facets of project management; the good thing on the other hand is that the PMI doesnâ€™t consider anybody excluded on the ground that he/she has no experience in so-called prime fields. Even those with their experience in a home improvement project, event orchestration, or in administrative support projects are all considered qualified for the exam.
