Mr. Mohan was a senior architect who worked for an Australian Company and ran his own consultancy chamber in a recently developed glamorous township of Delhi. He sat from 4p.m to 8p.m everyday in his little office and attended to people who wanted their house plans made up. Closer to the submission of the property tax, people would line up outside his office to get their property plans regularized. He would do all that because he liked his job immensely. In the mornings Mr. Mohan would supervise the progress of the 7 start hotel that was coming up near the IGI Airport.

That was his routine everyday, except for Sundays when he would sit at his chamber. But for the past week, Mr. Mohan had kept his consultancy chamber closed because he was busy visiting schools. He should have put up a board to tell all his clientâ€™s he would not be available for a week, but the point is that his absence from his little office was taking more than a week. Mr. Mohan would stand for hours in a line waiting to buy school admission forms for his son who was ready for class 1.

At times, he would take his son Vikrant with him on his visit to umpteen schools, but after all he was a kid and couldnâ€™t wait with his father in a line for long. After a week, Mr. Mohan asked his friend Sandeep if he could sit at his chambers. Sandeep sat for a few days and then had to go out of station because his father-in law was not well. This left Mr. Mohan quite frustrated with the way things were going on. He had barely covered 3 schools from what he knew of the point system and didnâ€™t feel very confident that his child would surely get into those schools.

There were parents buying 50 forms, to widen the scope of getting their child admitted in a school. Mr. Mohan made a mental calculation of how many days he would have to keep his office closed. In a week he would only be able to collect 20 forms. He also had to pay up for the rent of 20K for his office and he had missed 3 days of good business already. He was now loosing out on an income. Mr. Mohanâ€™s friend Sandeep sensed his worry while conversing over the phone.

That day Sandeep met a young school teacher who had checked into the same hotel. Since Sandeep was on holiday, he was enjoying himself but couldnâ€™t forget Mohanâ€™s worry and at dinner chanced to ask the lady teacher whether there was any other way by which schools could be traced. She thought for a while and asked whether he had tried onlineschooladmissions.com where right from the choice of schools to the submission of documents and scheduling an interview, everything was done online and the parent only had to take the child for the interview. That night, Sandeep had an answer for Mohan and it made them both very happy.
