One of the most important moments in your life is when you are choosing the best interior design schools, and at first it can seem like a daunting task. We can help you make sure your decision is a sound one and turn the process into an easy one.

Too often, prospective interior design students only consider the large and famous schools when thinking of the best interior design schools. This, however, isnâ€™t always the case, as the programs at many of the smaller interior design schools are just as strong, if not more so, than interior design programs at the larger schools. And, there is the additional benefit of having smaller classes, which give the students more opportunities to have one-to-one attention from the interior design faculty and direct communication with their instructors. Additionally, even though some students enjoy the livelier environment that larger schools may have, many students work best in more close-knit communities at the smaller interior design schools.

As you will be living at your school of choice for a rather long time, definitely consider the location of the interior design school. Consider whether you prefer a quiet, rural neighborhood or a busier urban area. For many, a simple change of setting is just what is needed for a new burst of inspiration. Living farther away from where you grew up gives can broaden your horizons and expand your perspective, truly a valuable and life-changing experience. Many interior design students, however, may find that the emotional support and comfort of friends and family positively influence their success, especially in competitive interior design schools.

The quality of the interior design schoolâ€™s academic programs is of course very important as well. Consider your specific talents and interests in the field of interior design, and then compare them to the best interior design schools you are choosing between. Browse the interior design facultyâ€™s teaching credentials and interior design portfolios. And, look for famous and successful animators amongst the interior design schoolâ€™s alumni to get an idea of the relative strengths of the interior design programs.

Extracurricular activities, athletics, and other non-academic aspects are also useful to think about when choosing an interior design school. Students who are active in community service may want to participate in school and give back to the nearby neighborhoods. Students who are enjoy athletics can choose interior design schools that are active in sports.

The costs of the interior design program and other academic fees are other key factors you will want to consider. Prepare to apply for grants, scholarships, or work-study programs as soon as you are able to. Remember that a more costly interior design school can work for those who have the means, but there are many less costly interior design schools that provide the same, or even higher, level of education!

Finally, choosing an interior design school is a very personal process â€“ what really determines the best interior design school varies from student to student.

So, follow our guide, think about what the best interior design school is for you, and begin your bright future in interior design by taking the right step forward!
