The content of Medical Teaching Courses by Julia Roger

Article published on January 17th 2012 | Education

Medical teaching courses are aimed at qualified doctors who want to develop their own teaching skills in order for them to carry out effective teaching and presentations to medical students under their supervision. Many qualified doctors will have trainee and junior doctors working alongside them and they will be required to carry out teaching sessions to share their knowledge. This can be daunting if you have never taught before so medical teaching courses will equip you will all the necessary skills to become a confident and effective teacher. Medical teaching courses tend to be short courses run over one or two days in small group sizes.

Different medical teaching courses may contain different content but the majority will cover the same key elements. These include how to develop and write structured teaching objectives, the key elements of education theory, how to adapt your teaching to different learning styles, how to deliver effective presentations, one to one coaching, giving feedback and dealing strategies for dealing with difficult students. Most medical teaching courses will be tailored around the participants own needs and the areas they want to learn most about. Teaching courses for doctors are very popular so most companies that offer this type of course will run them on a regular basis to meet the demand.

There are many different teaching courses for doctors but if you want to get a good all round knowledge of teaching then short medical teaching courses are ideal for you. If you work in management within the medical profession then there are many specific medial teaching courses for this level and there also teaching courses for doctors specifically for NHS workers. Teaching courses for doctors will vary in price depending on the level of the course and the course content but they are well worth the investment for your career development
