Children always consider their parents to be their first teacher in the world. No one can teach a child in a better way than his own parents because at that point of age, a kidâ€™s entire world is surrounded by his parents. Though, home is the best place to start a childâ€™s education but the tiny tots are required to be taught the formal education as well. In that case, the perfect age for a kidâ€™s admission is two and a half a year. A childâ€™s brain is fresher than adults and receives every new thing in a faster rate. There are many play schools and nursery schools that provide education to the children as well as engage them in co-curricular activities. Now a day the admission process in school has become difficult. Even it takes a long time to get a child admitted in the Nursery schools.

If parents are concerned about their childâ€™s pre-nursery or nursery education, they should admit their child by the age of 2 and a half. Children catch up things very fast and easily and at the age of 2 and a half they start catching up things more frequently. Nursery schools not only go by the formal education of the students but also encourage them for the co- curricular activities which include drawing, dance, trying out new games, sports, etc. These activities help the tiny tots to excel in other aspects of life as well as to avoid the boredom which they may face while going through the everyday formal education at school. Some kids are fast learners and with more intelligibility they grab new ideas and concepts as compared to others. The kids who are not fast learners can be improved by admitting them in nursery schools at the right age. Nursery schools also highlight on the creative aspects of a child. Apart from studies, children are also taught how to eat, how to sit and how to behave with people. Along with studies a child learns everything in a nursery school which he learns at home. Moreover, they get the opportunities to make friends with whom they can spend a good time.
