Tips on Finding the Right Daycare Center by Cody Rist

Article published on May 23rd 2012 | Education

Leaving your child under someone elseâ€™s care can be very difficult for any parent. Thereâ€™s that lingering uncertainty about what goes on behind closed doors; with reports about fly-by-night daycare centers propping up in the news, it certainly doesnâ€™t help matters that there seems little else parents can do but trust that theyâ€™ve made the right choice.

Choosing the first daycare center for your child is the single most important decision you can make, reiterates Linda Hassan Anderson, senior director at the National Association for the Education of Young Children (NAEYC). According to an article at TheBump.com, Anderson stated that parents should look for a quality daycare because the childâ€™s time at the daycare coincides with the most crucial time in a childâ€™s brain development. If you want tips in finding the right daycare for your child, you can check out the following tips.

Ask around. Research

Your starting point will always be asking for recommendation from other parents. You could ask your colleagues or family member and you can even do your own research by checking out local listings online. Most of these websites offer unbiased reviews from users so you will have more or less an overview of what their program is like.

Inspect the facilities and the program

Make sure the facilities are up-to-date and the programs are appropriate for the kidâ€™s level. Some daycare centers such as Little Sunshine's Playhouse even have â€œkiddie camsâ€• installed in every classroom and playground, which helps parents monitor their children even while theyâ€™re at work. These cameras are streamed live and you can access it online via secure username and password. They also evaluate your childâ€™s developmental progress on a bi-annual basis.

Visit the facilities at different times of the day

According to the Guidelines for Choosing Quality Child Care by Yale University, parents should visit the facilities at different parts of the day to get an accurate overview of the facilities. By visiting in the middle of the day, you can witness firsthand the way caregivers and educators interact with the children. At Little Sunshine's Playhouse, you could check out the classes and their respective activities which are streamed online.
