Veterans and Vocational Schools

by William Hauselberg

Article published on February 23rd 2012 | Education

For a newly discharged soldier, re entering civilian life can be a challenge for many reasons. One of the most paramount concerns for veterans is finding a new career. Veterans often don't have to look too far to find army friendly schools where they can study to begin a post military career.

Finding and attending a vocational school

For a prospective student, finding Army friendly schools involves determining if they offer the subjects he or she desires to take, and do they understand the unique benefits of attracting former service people. A vocational school suited for former soldiers will be prepared to focus on the education of self-motivated and skilled individuals. This is especially important when considering that unlike many civilian students, former soldiers have often obtained some degree of experience in their chosen field as a part of their military service.

In addition, prospective students should consider what their educational needs will be. In some cases, military experience may substitute for some normally required classes. Army friendly schools will examine their students records in order to determine exactly what classes they need to take and if their experience will allow them to bypass any of those classes. In this way, in addition to obtaining an education, former soldiers can spend as little time as possible at school before starting their careers.

Funding your vocational education

The armed forces provide a number of Army scholarships for qualified individuals. These can drastically reduce the cost of an education or make it completely free for some students.

The most important program is the Montgomery GI Bill, which was established after World War II. The GI Bill will pay for up to 36 months of education, ranging from vocational schools to four-year colleges. The total price a former service member receives depends on the Consumer Price Index (CPI) and the length and type of the soldierâ€™s service. However, GI Bill related Army scholarships could pay as much as $1,000 a month for school related expenses. Tuition Assistance (TA) programs are also available for former soldiers and will pay up to 100 percent of the cost of his or her education, with a cap of $250 per credit hour.

For a soldier, furthering their education is an important personal and professional goal, especially in todayâ€™s economy. Fortunately, with programs such as the GI Bill and Tuition Assistance, they can easily obtain the education they desire.

Article Source:
http://www.articleside.com/education-articles/veterans-and-vocational-schools.htm - Article Side

William Hauselberg - About Author:
The author has an immense knowledge on a Army friendly schools. Know more about a Army scholarships related info in his website.

Article Keywords:

Army friendly schools, Army scholarships

You can find more free articles on Article Side. Sign up today and share your knowledge to the community! It is completely FREE!