From the day a child is born, parents try hard to make them accustomed with anything and everything. They also try to make their kid familiar with animals. Therefore, they take them to zoo and other places like circus to teach them how animals are kept. However, taking them to circus may play a different role because when parents take their kids to the circus, they in a roundabout way convey them the message that animals are substance to be used, and it is quite accepted to pay no attention to any pain and anguish that the animals might be going through. These kids may grow up with lack of understanding, or the knack to realize the feelings of others. If they are not capable to be familiar with when somebody else is suffering, they will have troubles getting along with other people.

Animals such as tigers and elephants are not enthusiastic partakers in circuses. Unlike domestic animals, they are bred to work and live with human beings. On the event of circus, during their performance they may all of a sudden attack the spectators. The trainers mostly make use of whips, chains and hooks to get a control them. Wild animals that perform by standing on their heads and jump from end to end of studs perform against nature acts, under the danger of force.

Kids who observe these shows learn that it is okay to compel other living things to do something that is demanding, and often even hurting, as long as it serves the reason of amusement. This frame of mind will take over into their other relationships with people, and it will not help them to live a healthy life in the society.Circuses feature human circus performer as amazing alternatives to animal shows, and equally wonderful for kids. For parents who are actually paying attention to teach their kids about wild animals, for them and their kids watching nature videos is the best choice.

Teaching kids to be pleased about living things for what they are, helps them to develop understanding and admiration for all living things. When we are motivated to raise socially conscientious and successful citizens in our society, nothing could be more imperative.
