If you are a fleet driver and are required to take fleet driver training, it is only prudent to ask - why do you need it in the first place? How can it benefit you? You could already be a safe driver and respect all the rules of the road. Then how can it add value to your professional life? If you are a company employing such drivers, it is important to know how corporate fleet training can both enhance your reputation as well as lower operating costs.

Proactive driving

As a fleet driver, you spend a great deal of time on road. As a result, you are bound to come face to face with a number of unprecedented situations during your career. You may have to drive in low visibility conditions or other unsafe circumstances. Knowing how to drive proactively on intersections and high speed roads can go a long way toward saving lives, including your own. Fleet driving training can help you learn all the proactive practices for safer driving, which can actually divert disaster at times. Such a training session also teaches students about the various safety devices to be used during driving. Student drivers learn about emergencies and weight transfer, as well as how to share road with other fellow drivers.

Cargo van driving/ 15-passenger van driving

To drive a Cargo Van is not a simple task. You must protect both the cargo and the vehicle as well as drive safely for the safety of your own life and the life of others you share the road with. As a safe cargo van driver, you also uphold the good reputation of your employer. As a result, cargo van driving is a popular corporate fleet training program.

Likewise, driving a 15-passenger van is highly stressful as the driver feels accountable for the safety of the passengers. While dealing with people, the driver should not only be safe while driving, but also be courteous while loading and unloading passengers. With appropriate online Fleet Driver Training, 15-passenger van driver students learn to drive safely and how to handle emergencies.

In addition to proactive or defensive driver training, good online Corporate Fleet Training programs include distracted driving, how to overcome drowsy driving, and understanding how emotions affect aggressive driving. These fleet driving training programs are designed to address specific issues that you might face as a driver. Online training modules only take between 35 minutes to 90 minutes, are easy to take and can be very helpful in enhancing your value to your employer.
