The success in the sport of paintball depends on the marker you are using. And hence having some knowledge about them is very important as your performance and shooting capability entirely rests on this piece of equipment. Among the various types of paintball guns available in market, the electro-pneumatic types are becoming increasingly popular. Working on the principle of the semi-automatic design, these markers or guns originated from the military technology and uses an installed computer which has captured the attention of many players.

Itâ€™s true that when these were first launched in market, they were very expensive even to think of. But with time they are now available at an affordable rate and at times are far cheaper than expected. The BPS of these guns is much higher in comparison to other models and they are capable of reaching firing frequencies of above 25. Though the sport requires the players to limit their firing rate at 15 balls per second for safety and enjoyment reasons, but with such a higher firing frequency you are sure to achieve the maximum fun, satisfaction and success out of the game.

The trigger pull on these paintball guns feels as simple as a mouse click. When triggered, it simulates a switch which in turn conveys the message to the installed computer. The firing action gets activated when the computer prompts the electro-pneumatic mechanism thereby commanding it to release a burst of CO2 gas to carry out the requested task. The whole process looks quite complicated and you might think that it will take time to perform the sequence of actions.

Furthermore, you get the facility to set your preferred firing option in the computer which makes the gun far more intelligent. The presence of dipswitches inside the grip of the gun programs this equipment making it convenient for use. Battery operated, these guns are rechargeable.
