The recurring credit card processing is a delicate process as one wrong move can invite financial troubles.. There are many types of businesses that have had sweaty-palmed experiences in the past. This is in addition to the vehement criticism they encounter related to their products and services.

At the same time, because CC or Credit Card transactions have become immensely popular as the perfect means for payment, the process of recurring credit card processing has acquired importance. Till the time these forms of payment came into existence, it was the banks that played the leading role of providing credit. It was the advent of internet that saw the emergence of third party agencies entering this domain..

It is interesting to note that recurring payment processing rates keep fluctuating from one service provider to another. Moreover, the rate they charge is mostly depended on a number of factors such as sale volume, sale amount, credit rating enjoyed by the business owner, etc.

The calculation of recurring credit card processing fees is a technical issue requiring expertise to calculate the exact amount. For instance, a POS or gateway system has the additional monthly and transaction fees while the machines do not impose any recurring fees. Therefore, while calculating processing fees, it must be ensured the recurring cost associated with software or equipment is considered adequately. According to a recently concluded survey, it has been found that the applicable fees will largely depend on the type of Pricing Model being used in the processor. These processors are well known for structuring fees that are essentially based on a pass through or tiered models.
