Choosing the Best Tea by James

Article published on February 22nd 2012 | Food

Although the sense of â€˜bestâ€™ is subjective and personal, there are few p yardsticks which are referred to when calling a product â€˜bestâ€™. Since, tea is a very common beverage and popular in almost every part of the world, there are a few basic traits which shall enable one to identify the best tea that is available in the market.

Below enlisted are certain features that one should look for, while purchasing tea from the market:

â€¢ Appearance of the tea leaves is a thing to judge. Various kinds of tea leaves are available: flat, strips, flakes, powder and so on. The best quality tea leaves would be hairy and also tender to touch. The best quality leaves would have intact tips.

â€¢ Ensure that the moisture content of the leaves is low. This can be ensured if the dried leaves break upon slight pressing. Damp leaves lack aroma.

â€¢ Excellent quality tea leaves would have a rich aroma and no artificial smell.

â€¢ The other factors to judge are: color, texture, and brand of course.

However, a person has to be very cautious when he or she is planning to buy tea online. Since, here there is no such way of judging these things other means have to be adopted of ensuring that the tea is of good quality. It is always advisable in this case to go for best tea brands instead of loose packets. Moreover, also ensure that the website is up to date and try to get hold of the contact number of that online shop. If available, see the testimonials of that website.

Teas are best if purchased from tea producing areas like Darjeeling, Assam, Sikkim and so on. Exported tea leaves from these places are available loose and should always be purchased in this form. It is better not to purchase packets or sachets as these are mostly of inferior quality.
