Cut Price Kitchen Catering Equipment in Good Condition by Anthony Parham

Article published on January 3rd 2012 | Food

Times are hard for many companies in the UK at the moment and in particular, for the many cafÃ©s and restaurants that can be found in towns and villages across the country. Eating out is one of the first areas where people look to make cuts when money is tight so it is vital that businesses are able to respond by lowering their prices or running special promotions during times such as those that we are living in today.

Whilst there are a number of suppliers of cooking equipment that are able to undercut their competitors, if you are looking to save a significant amount of money then it may be necessary to think about buying reconditioned units instead of brand new ones. As long as you stick to suppliers that have a good reputation for checking every item they sell thoroughly before despatch, it should be possible for you to pick up some real bargains without any negative impact on your business operations.

The high failure rate of new restaurants means that there is plenty of good quality second hand kitchen catering equipment available at all times. Much of this can be found at prices that are up to 60% lower than equivalent brand new machinery. This represents a significant saving for firms that are looking to replace some or all of their appliances and is the main reason that the market for this equipment has grown exponentially in recent years.

Hygiene is of primary importance to any establishment that sells food to the public so it goes without saying that any second hand accessories you purchase for your business should be spotless when they arrive. If this is not the case then it is probably a good idea to look for another supplier or hire somebody to clean every item that you buy before it is installed on your premises.

If you are lucky then there may be a company in your area that specialises in selling used equipment but if not, there is no need to despair as most such companies advertise on the Internet and are happy to deal with restaurants, bars, hotels and cafÃ©s in all parts of the country. You may have to pay a delivery charge but you should still save a lot of money compared to buying new equipment.
