While it may be difficult to imagine, but the pigeon is themost severe bird pest to humans, and nowhere is that more true than in Phoenix, Arizona. In fact, there was such a pigeon problem in the city that last year the Arizona Game & Fish Department changed the requirements for 2011 â€“ 2012. This change opened up a million acres near municipal areas in the state to allow hunters to take up to ten pigeons a day, even going as far as allowing them to hunt until sunset all over the state. Wondering why such drastic measures were necessary? There are actually several reasons you may not want a flock near your home.

As any Phoenix pest control professional will tell you, pigeons are filthy animals. The waste is made up of both moisture and protein, and that can not only play host to some very serious diseases, but it can also attract other pests, only multiplying your problems.

Health concerns as a result of the waste is one of the biggest concerns associated with pigeons. There are 60 different bacterial diseases and viruses associated with pigeons, and that can create a serious problem for the elderly, the very young, and immune-compromised individuals. That can make cleaning up the waste a very difficult prospect. You canâ€™t sweep the waste because it can create microscopic particles, which can then be inhaled.

Whatâ€™s more, though, is that you have to use rubber gloves and a mask any time you handle the waste. If you have a small cut on your hand, it could be easily infected while youâ€™re trying to clean up the waste from these birds.

Additionally, property damage is a real concern to homeowners when youâ€™re struggling with a pigeon problem. The waste from a pigeon can create real problems when it comes to water drainage on rooftops. It can clog runoff locations, which may create a water issue under the roof tiles. From there, the water can seep into the roofing materials, and it may ruin a ceiling. Additionally, the uric acid can break down asphalt shingles. It can even melt paint and stucco.

If you do have a pigeon problem, the best solution is to contact a Phoenix pest control professional like Invader Pest Management. With the tools necessary to ensure your pigeon problem wonâ€™t damage your health or your home, Invader Pest Management can make your pigeon problem, no problem.
