There are various types of ink cartridges available in the market. When it comes to purchase ink for your printer, the most important thing you have to consider is which type of cartridge is compatible for your printer. If you own a Canon printer, then the ideal match would be the compatible ink cartridges of the same brand, Canon. Again, if you own HP printers, then look for HP printer ink cartridges.  These are called the brand name Ink Cartridges.

These are generally manufactured by the original ink-manufacturing companies such as Brother, Canon, Epson, HP and Lexmark. This option of printer unit is typically more expensive but if you are seeking for quality and durability, it is the right option to be worth purchasing. It is not unusual to spend more on printer cartridge than the device itself as it is the crucial part that operates the printer.

However, there are also some other options that are generally lower in cost. They are the unbranded or the generic stuffs that do not come with brand tag so no one can identify the manufacturer producing the particular unit. The experts commented that buying cheap cartridges might dissatisfy you in terms of quality, yield and output. So it is said that buying cheap cartridges might clog the nozzles of the printer and cause damage to the life of the printer.  While buying inexpensive options might be a little tempting initially, you have to mull over the things that might end up spending you more in the future.

Inkjet refill is another affordable alternative that many shops and printer ink suppliers go for since the cost is cheaper. With this particular option, there is no need to buy another cartridge once the ink has been completely used up. However, refillable ink kits usually make a mess, thereby causing great hassles. But if you follow the instructions strictly when installing it in the printer, you can do it easily. This option saves a lot of money and one particular unit can be used up to 7 to 8 times.

Remanufactured cartridges are also in great demand these days. These units are compatible and work well with your branded printer. Manufactured by third party manufacturer, the remanufactured cartridges do not expect the quality to rival that of the original ones but the quality of the remanufactured ones are usually up to par.

These are all about the different types of ink cartridges available. So, make a right choice and get the right units that are most convenient for you.
