Some women who have undergone breast augmentation in the past and are now pregnant worry about the effects this cosmetic procedure may have on their unborn children. Some believe that the implants would have adverse effects on babies in the womb, while others think their breast-feeding capabilities will be impaired because of the surgery. Yet most cosmetic surgeons would tell you they have nothing to worry about.

People undergo breast augmentation procedures for two major reasons: health or aesthetics. Women who have breast cancer usually undergo breast augmentation because their normal breast tissues were lost due to the illness, while others get work done on their breasts to achieve symmetry. Regardless of the reason, the procedure remains the same—the plastic surgeon makes incisions on the breasts, through which the implants are inserted. As mentioned above, some people believe that this may negatively impact their capability to raise their kids.

Breast-Feeding

One of the most common fears among pregnant women is that breast augmentation would render them unable to breast feed. Cosmetic surgeons say that the procedure should have no effect whatsoever on breast-feeding. The implants are inserted under the breast muscle, and the muscle acts as a barrier between the implants and the milk ducts.

Pregnancy Risks

Another common fear is that the implants might have adverse effects on the fetus. This shouldn't be a problem, unless the silicone or saline implants rupture and leak through the bloodstream. If this happens, contact a doctor immediately as the implants would have to be repaired or removed.

Sagging Implants

Most women, regardless of whether they underwent breast augmentation Salt Lake City doctors offer, report that pregnancy causes their breasts to sag and lose shape. This is a natural process. After the pregnancy, they could always opt for a breast lift to restore their breasts to the desirable shape and size.

Augmentation after Pregnancy

After giving birth, some women opt to get breast implants Salt Lake City surgeons offer. Doctors suggest that the best time to get breast implants would be after weaning. At this stage, there would no longer be any risks of the implants causing adverse effects on your child's growth.

If you're interested in breast augmentation, or if you have any questions regarding its effect on pregnancy, it would be best to consult qualified Utah breast augmentation surgeons to know your options.
