Most people will agree that the brain is one of the most important parts of the body, primarily because it tells all the other parts what to do. It tells your body when to talk, when to walk, or when to feel pain. If the brain isn't in tip top shape, life is going to get a whole lot harder.

When something happens to the brain, especially if it is because of a car accident or a fall, this is referred to as a traumatic brain injury. If this injury resulted from another person's negligence, you have the right to file a personal injury claim. However, getting compensation for your injuries can be tricky business, especially when you're in pain and you have to wade through all the lawyers in Florida. But you have to get started somehow, so here are some of the frequently asked questions people have about brain injury claims.

Is brain injury a separate specialty for lawyers?

Brain injury claims are legal minefields because the injury can be caused by a lot of things and claims can easily be dismissed if not handled correctly. This is why most law firms have a separate division of lawyers that specialize in brain injury claims. These people know all the twists and turns of your situation and will be able to help you out.

How do I prove I have a brain injury?

Proving your injury requires you to hire medical professionals that can give evidence to verify it. You can be sure that the defense would hire their own doctors to evaluate you, so you'd need a neuropsychologist who can convincingly rebut the claims of the other party. These professionals have to present quantifiable proof that will sway the decision in your favor.

Will going back to work affect my lawsuit?

Most people think that going back to work might injure the chances of their lawsuit, but in fact, this might actually help your claim. A Florida brain injury attorney would advise you to document all the issues that you've been encountering in the office ever since you were injured. You can also ask your co-workers to verify the effects your brain injury are having on your work.

How can I find traumatic brain injury lawyers?

Going online will give you a lot of results and you might find it hard to choose. One of the best places to narrow down your search is the Florida Bar Association site. It has a page dedicated to brain injury lawyers in the state.
