The significance of the nose when it comes to a person's look is unquestionable. As it is in the center of the face, the nose is simply noticeable, which is why any ailment or defect on it will be very complicated to conceal, if at all. This has then given rise to the reputation of rhinoplasty, or what we generally know as a "nose job", that can repair or correct most physical deformities of the nose. So popular this technique has turn into, that there is now even male rhinoplasty precisely for men.

For many reasons patients have performed this procedure. Some do not like how aging has changed their noses; some are not satisfied with their natural noses while some have incurred injuries to their noses. A nose job can make the nose more defined, smaller, makes it less protrusive, reconstruct damaged nose, and rectifies a drooping nasal tip or a correction of deviated septum and more. The objective of the procedure is to give each patient a nose that works normally and go well with his or her face.

However, the methodology and technology is not always flourishing, in spite of much advancement over the decades. In addition, when this happens, the consequences of the surgery may not be to the liking of the patient, whether it is because the appearance is not what they initially thought, or because there are complications that both changed the outcome, or cause distress or soreness. This is where revision rhinoplasty comes in.

Revision rhinoplasty is utilized to fix the roughly 15% of all such procedures, which conclude improperly, causing either cosmetic or functional problems. While surgeons can give an idea as to how a nose job process would end up, only by doing the actual operation will the client get to see what the end results would be. In addition, sometimes, projections do not live up to anticipations, and patients end up being discontented with the surgery results.

In addition, there are cases where the nose might look in good health, but actually has a number of functional difficulties. These include complications underneath the tissue and skin, nasal collapse and added problems, which can cause anything from difficulty in breathing, infection and pain.

These nose job complications cause not just cosmetic and physical damage, but also psychological and emotional trauma. When patients spend huge sums of money only to understand that they did not get exactly what they want, this can make them feel discouraged, and have self-respect, self-esteem issues. Some will not find the audacity to go out in public without revision rhinoplasty fitting the problems.

It is important to note, however, that this method is not as trouble-free as it sounds. It is not like fixing a car that has been repaired imperfectly. This is why, it is essential to find the finest surgeon available and the best clinic for revision rhinoplasty.
