Egg donor programs have the utmost respect and admiration for their egg donors, as it's these young women that enable donor clinics to succeed. Since egg freezing is a relatively new medical technology, the FDA has limited regulations in place for donor programs to follow. While there are certain standards that the programs must meet, many choose to adopt their own criteria that keep their programs safe for donors, while giving recipient couples the greatest chance at conceiving a child.

Egg donor programs are located across the United States. Many of them have a strong online presence and place their database of donors online so that recipient couples can browse through the available donors and have the frozen eggs shipped to their doctor. With this approach, egg donor programs are able to reach out to the most people and extend their donor database to couples who may have limited clinics in their area.

For donors, the location of the clinic is a prime concern, as the donor has to be available for genetic testing, psychological and medical evaluations, as well as doctor appointments, ultrasounds and follow-up appointments. Since an average donor cycle takes a few months from start to finish, this can include a lot of traveling if the donor lives out of state. Not only is this added pressure for the donor, but also it can cause the cost of the donation to be more, as the recipient couple has to cover all the costs incurred by the donor.

For these reasons, some donor programs only accept egg donors that reside in the same state. They are able to keep the cost of the egg donation at a fair amount for the recipient couple, as there will be no travel costs to pay for. This also places less stress on the donor, as she won't have to travel or stay in a hotel for any parts of the donation process. Furthermore, donor programs are able to be more familiar with their egg donors, as they can target specific colleges or groups of young girls that make ideal donors. In turn, the donor program can earn a strong reputation within the community.

There are many advantages to working with local donors. However, not all donor programs have these qualifications in place, so you will have to read what the initial criteria is for becoming an egg donor with a particular program. For example, if you plan on being an egg donor Atlanta, you can review the various programs within the state and determine which ones cater to Atlanta-based donors. The recipient couple may or may not come from the state, but you can be assured that all testing and procedures will be within driving distance.

Of course, location isn't the only factor to be concerned with. You should also consider such factors as how long you will have to wait to donate, how much the compensation is and the type of care you will receive. All of these elements vary greatly across donor programs.

Ideally, you want to work with an egg donor Atlanta program that has a short wait time. Many donor programs take six to nine months or more to start the process, and as you know from life's circumstances, it's difficult to predict where you will be at the time. If you're making the decision to be an egg donor and want to start today, consider an egg donor program that will allow you to start donating immediately, once the initial screenings are cleared. The compensation should be between $5,000 and $10,000, and some programs may pay more for subsequent donations.

Some egg donor Atlanta programs also reward their donors for referrals, which can be a nice financial perk if you happen to refer a friend or colleague to the same donor program. Generally, these types of programs are interested in the highest quality donors which is why they reach out to existing donors for recommendations and try to keep within their own community. No matter which program you choose to work with, all information should be presented in a clear, concise manner. Although not everyone understands the power of egg donations at this time, it's a medical technology to be proud of, and one that is affording couples the opportunity to have a child of their own.
