People keep aquariums for a variety of reasons. Whether you love having fish as pets or whether you consider your aquarium as an attractive addition to your room, you may want to include some additional features in your tank.

A bit of driftwood can add visual interest and charm in your tank. Before you drop the first piece of wood you find into your tank though, check with the local fish store and ensure you will get a piece that won't cause damage to your tank or to the fish. New wood pieces should be measured in a quarantine tank to make sure the piece is safe for the tank.

Aquarium ornaments can add a cute or original spin in your tank, such as the Reefkeeper elite. Plenty of options exist including divers, bridges, columns, or sunken ships. Pick something which looks nice with the overall style of your tank and also the colors of the fish.

Improve the lighting inside your tank using aquarium led lighting. Before you add or subtract any light, check with the neighborhood fish store to ensure that you get the right lighting for your fish and coral that you have living in your tank. Adding a light that simulates lunar light is a cool and realistic selection for a fish tank.

With respect to the shape of your tank, think about the positioning of the components of your tank. Think about aspects of design as you work on putting together rocks, plants, or other objects. Utilize a number of heights and angles to add interest in the space.

Many fish need substrate to be able to dig and hide in. It can provide a good place for bacteria to cultivate. Some options include quarts, granite, or fine sand. Although some silt may crop up in the tank when you first introduce it, it's going to settle over the course of a few days.

Choosing rocks that match your substrate can create some nice hiding places for your fish and keep your tank looking natural. Pick a few that match, or perhaps a larger rock could be broken to a few smaller pieces, like Fiji live rock, for the tank.

Make sure to position elements within your tank so they are far enough from the glass to allow you quick access. Rocks or ornaments that are too close to the edge can make it difficult to clean the glass. Don't forget to be creative when building your fish tank. Besides being home for the fish, you can create an aquarium a beautiful piece of art that can be quite a focal point for just about any room in the house.
