Hunting animals has been done for millions of years. Prehistoric man hunted animals mainly for survival. People needed the animals for something to eat, and they also used the fur for clothing. Today, while people still occasionally hunt for food, the practice has already become a hobby. Some people treat it as some kind of sport; they engage in trophy hunting.

In the United States, hunting is rather a popular hobby. A lot of places in the country have diverse wildlife, giving enthusiasts the chance to hone their skills. For some people, they like hunting smaller animals such as rabbits, squirrels and opossums, while others prefer birds like ducks, geese and doves. Others are more daring; they hunt predators such as coyotes, cougars and mountain lions. There are also people who prefer big game hunting; they target elk, bear, some species of deer, and many others.

Hunting is fun for a lot of people, but since it involves wildlife, there are regulations that have to be followed. For example, there is such a thing as open season. Open season is a time of the year when hunters are allowed to hunt and kill certain species. Closed season is when a particular species is protected from hunting. Open and closed seasons are designated to safeguard species at a time when they are most vulnerable, like during their breeding seasons. These are also established to help conserve wildlife in general, and to maintain the balance of nature. Aside from the wildlife protection, gun licenses are also a requirement for whoever is participating in any form of hunting.
