A guide to glass balustrades by Julia Roger

Article published on March 5th 2012 | Home Improvement

All sorts of people invest in glass balustrades â€“ and with good reason. They provide an important function, be that in a domestic or business property. They are also very attractive fittings which can improve the appearance of even the most impeccably decorated space. Put simply, glass balustrades are superb additions to all sorts of buildings.

Glass balustrades are ideal for both internal and external use. Inside buildings they are popular for mezzanines and staircases whereas outside they are often used around the perimeters of balconies. Glass balustrades look equally at home when they are incorporated into the structure of corporate premises as well as domestic properties.

As well as this, glass balustrades are important from a safety perspective. Similar to Juliet balconies (external balconies which do not protrude from the wall in question) they serve as a type of parapet, which prevent people from falling from great heights and injuring themselves badly. Therefore glass balustrades are good for your personal welfare as well as the aesthetics of a certain property.

The beauty of glass balustrades if that they are attractive as well as functional. Many interior designers espouse their virtues as a clean, contemporary fitting which helps give the feeling of space to a room or a balcony. Lots of people prefer their glass balustrades to have aluminium frames whereas others prefer the â€˜post onlyâ€™ look â€“ which is even more minimalist. The metal post can be painted but some homeowners or business owners are advocates of the bare, polished look.
