All-Weather Shelter for Your Car by Cooper

Article published on January 17th 2012 | Home Improvement

An ordinary garage is a good solution for an all-weather shelter for your car, but it has various complications attached to it â€“ it costs a lot of money to build one, and you also need to have plenty of space to accommodate for it. In most cases, it's just not a good option for you no matter how you consider it â€“ but if you still need something to protect your car from nature's forces, then you should look for some alternative options. There are certainly plenty other solutions that can work just as well for your needs, you just need to know about them in the first place.

There's always the classic solution of instant shelters which can work as one of the best types of all-weather shelter for your low-budget needs, especially for long-term storage (e.g. when you won't be touching the car a lot of time, such as when you're holding on to it as an investment). Instant shelters are great because they provide a very adequate all-weather shelter (even protecting against theft, not just weather, if you buy the right model), and they're also highly portable in most cases.

The way this type of shelter is built is very simple â€“ they just utilize a central metal frame which supports the entire shelter, and it's covered by a thick fabric, typically including several specific materials that are chosen for their high level of durability and longevity â€“ and therefore potential for long-term use. An all-weather shelter of this type should be water-proof even during a torrent, as long as you've attached and secured it properly according to its instruction manual â€“ and it should also be resistant to other natural forces such as wind and even sunlight.

Sunlight protection is actually a very important feature to note â€“ many people disregard the importance of their shelter's ability to effectively block sunlight, but this can go a long way towards protecting your car and the shelter itself. In many cases when the shelter starts degrading in quality, this would be because of wear caused by the effects of sunlight on the cover material, not from other types of damage. Because of this, modern all-weather shelter systems are designed with extensive attention to their ability to block out sunlight, so make sure you ask your seller if their products have these features present.

Last but not least, the installation of your all-weather shelter shouldn't be overly complicated â€“ this is another feature where the less-known brands on the market tend to fail, as renowned companies have walked a long path to developing a simple installation system which anyone can handle. You're going to need some basic tools in any case, but if you've bought a proper product you shouldn't need to hire an additional specialist just for the purpose of installing your shelter for you. This should comply with the warranty too â€“ in other words, the warranty shouldn't have clauses that make it void in case you've performed the installation on your own!
