What is Basement Waterproofing CT?

Most houses of today in Connecticut require a basement for storage facilities or for housing the boiler since temperatures fall below freezing point in winter here. A basement is always subsoil and this increases the tendency for damp to develop thus causing mold and mildew. basement waterproofing ct refers to prevention of the same.

Basement waterproofing CT prevents your basement in Connecticut from being invaded by the groundwater and reinforces your walls to resist the pressures of the groundwater. Along with this, the waterproofing solution also allows drainage by building a good sewerage system.

The available methods

Basement waterproofing ct is absolutely essential as the annual rainfall here is nearly 45 inches and this figure obviously rises in the monsoon season. There are basically three processes involved in basement waterproofing:

â€¢ Lining of the basement walls by a membrane to prevent infiltration of groundwater. This process is called â€œTankingâ€•

â€¢ Building of a thin honeycomb-like structure that basically creates a smooth slope towards a drainage channel an removes any intruded groundwater on the double. This is known as â€œCavity Drainage Systemâ€•

â€¢ Creating a drainage system that conducts and reroutes water away from the basement walls altogether thereby preventing any chances of damp. This method is known as â€œExterior Foundation Damâ€•.

The first two processes will be more than enough if your home situated in an area of low rainfall. The third is however necessary for families living in the country where rainfall is heavier than normal.

Since underground water seepage is a very common problem, many companies often conduct seminars and presentations on how to solve the problem. Needless to say, these companies in turn endorse their consultants and recommend them to do the job. One however has the opportunity to go online and search for various contractors to hire. Basement waterproofing in CT is not a problem.
