One of the biggest disadvantages of carpet flooring is its tendency to get easily stained. Compared to concrete or tile flooring, carpet is made of textile, a very porous material that pretty much acts as a dust and stain magnet. Fortunately, there are various techniques that can help deal with unsightly carpet stains.

Carpet stain removal techniques vary depending on the type of stain. One of the most common types of stains are pet stains like dog or cat urine. If you have carpet flooring and you allow your pet to stay in your house, you must find a good way to get rid of urine stains on a regular basis. Moistening and scrubbing the stained area using water-detergent solution is usually more than enough to remove the stain while water-vinegar solution applied in the area can help neutralize the smell.

Carpet stains are a common sight for kitchens in homes with full carpet flooring because there are always different types of liquids that can get spilled anytime. To deal with oil, you can make a simple mixture of water and detergent will do since the only substance that can mix water and oil is soap. Dealing with other types of carpet stains in the kitchen usually require the same cleaning agents, particularly vinegar-water and water-detergent solution.

Blood is the most misunderstood type of carpet stain. Blood stains should be removed using cold water. Hot water causes the blood to clot even more and set even further. This why even the most potent hot water extraction methods don't work well on blood stains.

In children and study rooms, the most common type of carpet stains are ink blots. Expert carpet cleaners Indianapolis has to offer recommend dampening the stained area with isopropyl alcohol-saturated cloth. Ink blots dislodge or dissolve in alcohol by scrubbing the surface mildly, but too much alcohol can damage the carpet dye and create faded spots.

Some stains like battery oil and mercury cannot be dealt with using home techniques. In fact, carpets that are stained with mercury must be disposed immediately. Indianapolis carpet cleaning professionals strongly advise homeowners to leave mercury stains to the professionals since the substance is considered highly.
