It's your house, and you can decorate it any way that you see fit, so it's a good idea to weigh a few different options before you settle on the right colors and style.

You might choose a particular motif that appeals to you, and then it's up to you to select various decorative elements that look good with each other. This might be a sensible decision, in that you can eliminate a lot of stores that don't offer what you want, and presumably you can then shop at the stores that sell your style.

So you've trimmed down your range of choices, and that can save work, but you just might be avoiding another style that might be an even better option. There's no law on the books that demands that you choose just one style of décor for your home, and you must stick to that or else the home décor police will write you up.

Rooms with several differing but companionable styles are sometimes called "eclectic," and you can try out some complementary styles, such as colonial and modern furniture. When you mix up differing styles of furniture and decorative elements, you might come up with an interesting hybrid that you might never have looked forward to.

Your wall of vintage day-glow psychedelic posters might really begin to speak to you "literally" once you combine them with round mirrors. Well-designed and built furnishings can be paired sometimes, regardless of the styles, because beautiful objects share a certain elegance that makes them compatible.

You can't really miss with round wall mirrors, because they blend with just about anything, and will add more visual zest to a room. While mirrors are often set apart from other decorative elements in a room, there's no reason why they can't be paired with artworks and other kinds of wall hangings.

You can take advantage of the way mirrors make a room appear larger, and place them in a room that might otherwise seem too cluttered and dark. You can really amp up the brightness in a room with just a few well-placed mirrors that will reflect light from windows, skylights or even your overhead lighting components.

Mirrors can also be set up on an opposing wall directly across from a marvelous painting or print, reflecting it so that viewers get twice the enjoyment. You never have to fret about mirrors clashing with anything else in your room, because they will only reflect the colors, lines and textures that are already there.

You could opt to hang nothing but mirrors all over your walls in a way in which they would be harmonious and decorative, and all you'd need to do is settle on frames.
