Article Side

Plantation Shutters Look Great on Any Home

by DJ Willis

Article published on February 28th 2012 | Home Improvement

There are more than just one kind of window coverings. Many people think of a window covering as drapes while some think of window shutters or screens. Every one of these things are accurate in terms of describing items which enable you to successfully and fashionably cover the windows at home.

Also, you can even count exterior wooden shutters, decorative bars, along with other items as a window covering as well. Think about ornate stained glass windows, for instance, those would belong to this classification as well. The bottom line is a window covering is any sort of item that covers a window either partially or fully.

The first variety of window covering was a curtain. Obviously, they didn't refer to them as curtains at the time because they do not even remotely represent what you'd call a curtain today. In early history, a window was a simple hole in the wall of a dwelling. To prevent the blowing wind, cold, and pests out, an animal hide was used to protect the window.

It wasn't very long after that the first shutters were used as window coverings. It was quickly learned that shutters made it more convenient for people to let air flow into their houses and were more effective in terms of temperature and pest management. As time went on, both shutters and curtains became more lavish, but shutters did not become a elegant option for the house until the last century.

It was the early church that began using stained glass as window covers; the Catholic church, more specifically. Centuries ago, stained glass was utilized to signify the wealth of the church. Naturally, designs were used to demonstrate their belief in God and their saints.

Over time, the affluent also began using opulent window designs to provide themselves with privacy while exhibiting their prosperity. This permitted these people to present creations and scenarios of art from the outside of their dwelling. Folks could observe for themselves just what kind of money the family had without actually setting foot within of the residence in question.

In the current world, window coverings can be found in a selection of methods. A number of people choose strictly drapes to operate as a covering for their windows. In fact, thanks to the affordability of drapes, this is the most common sort of window covering that you will come across. Different choices, such as window shutters, are usually no less than twice as expensive as curtains and are often much more expensive than curtains.

Other varieties of treatments for windows have fallen out of fashion through the years. Sure, there are many restored homes that have an emphasis on stained glass or lead designed windows, but overall, the typical house has window treatments or shutters. This doesn't detract from the fact that other options are attractive, it is just that these other options are just too expensive for the standard individual.

Article Source:
http://www.articleside.com/home-improvement-articles/plantation-shutters-look-great-on-any-home.htm - Article Side

DJ Willis - About Author:
Everyone knows that windows look better with the right a plantation shutters. There are many options for information to help you make the best decision.

Article Keywords:
home improvement, interior design, home, decorating

You can find more free articles on Article Side. Sign up today and share your knowledge to the community! It is completely FREE!