In each household, there may come a period when old, dilapidated windows would have to be replaced with newer, superior ones to provide greater protection and energy efficiency. Replacement windows are installed onto existing window frames to give greater insulation and ventilation. As there are many styles of windows, homeowners have different kinds of replacement window options available to them. Below are some fundamental types of replacement windows worth reading about.

One of the most preferred window replacement choices is the bow window.

As its name indicates, it is curved similar to a bow and supplies a wide panorama of the outside. This style of window was introduced into the United States by British settlers in the eighteenth century. Installing bow windows in your house gives several perks, one of these is the capacity to make a room seem sunnier, loftier, and more sophisticated. Additionally, bay windows add more illumination and air flow, providing a constant source of fresh air.

Next, another prominent type of replacement window is the jalousie window, also known as the louver window. When you take a closer look at these windows, you will observe that they are composed of glass slats which are placed as panels within metal clips. These glass slat boards are rotated like shutters manually to open and close. This shutter function of jalousie windows allows property owners to moderate the air flow in their properties.

The patio window is another selection for replacement windows Northern Virginia homeowners love. Patio windows arrive in different styles, patterns and dimensions, but are ordinarily floor-to-ceiling windows that let the outside in, so to speak. The ideal selection of patio windows all depends on the taste of every property owner and the design and architectural demands of a home.

Occasionally considered as an option for window replacement Northern Virginia locals also adore, the arched window is not your typical, everyday window. Arched windows are frequently included into properties to add a degree of complexity and class to the architecture. Before having arched windows or any type of window replacement mounted onto your house for that matter, it would be best to speak with a specialist first to ascertain its applicability.

Lastly, examine the hopper window. This style of window is a bottom hung casement window. Several kinds of hopper windows Northern Virginia properties have tilt open at the top and come with lever handles to hold them in place against the breeze.
