What is a cigar humidor? Many people may like the idea of owning one if they only knew what it is. Itâ€™s an older, more traditional type of masculine item, but can easily be taken in to the modern day with style, class, and enjoyment. There are wood designers such as Carolina Wood Designs, based in Charlotte, North Carolina, who actually still construct quality cigar humidors from natural woods and create custom designs for those very interested. These wood crafters are particularly able to make interesting designs, as they have other experience with exotic wood cutting boards and creative wooden cutting board designs. This article will give you basic information about cigar humidors.

When you have a custom built humidor, youâ€™ll be able to request whatever size youâ€™d like, so long itâ€™s practical given the wood construction and design. For example, you can get a small wooden box, or you can get a mid-sized wooden box, or something almost as large as a room. There actually are even entire rooms dedicated to storing and aging cigars. This is similar to a wine cellar, where the temperature and humidity of the room are specific in order to produce quality in the products stored within it.

Optimally, the range for a cigar humidor is about 68% to 72% humidity when at room temperature. The humidor will have a humidification system built into it, or else a device adds or removes moisture from the interior space so that the humidity level stays desirable. A place like Carolina Wood Designs is able to build all aspects of the humidor so that customers have one complete unit, with intricate, exotic wooden designs if they prefer. The inside of the cigar humidor is usually made with Spanish cedar, for its specific quality as a wood.

Cigar humidors are more quality when they are designed with wooden boards carved with meaningful styles to a family. They can become attractive pieces of furniture as well as a family heirloom. With this in mind, contracting a place like Carolina Wood Designs becomes a wise choice.
