Your roof is one of the most important aspects of your home. If you neglect it, chances are that it can literally come down over your head. Experts believe that you need to get your roof inspected at least twice a year. The main idea is to check for seasonal stress and any other damage that your roof may have been subjected to. The best times to check are in spring and in fall.

When you get in the experts to check your roof, here is what you can expect them to do. They will first look at the inside of your home. They will look for spots where your roof may be sagging in a bit. They will also look for any sign of water damage or excessive leakage. Tell tale signs will be dark spots on your walls or trails. If there any place where outdoor light in visible through the roof, then this will be looked into.

Next the experts will get onto the roof and check it from the outside. They will look for flashing that is damaged, shingles that may be missing, tiles that maybe curling or blistering or any part of the roof that seems like it is buckling under the weight. They will also check for growth of algae or any signs of rotting.

When a check is being conducted on the outside, all the extra fittings such as that of chimneys, vents as well as drain pipes will be inspected for any damage, leak or clogging. They will look at your gutters and check for excessive shingle dust that can result in clogging. With such clogging the growth of water-borne mold and fungus too is pretty high.

All of these inspections can be a do-it-yourself job too if you like. Once you know the condition of your roof, you can call in the experts to help you with dealing with it. If you are doing this for the first time, then make sure that the expert you call in is of good reputation. Check with friends and family and work on the basis of recommendations. Once you have the contact of a reliable roofing contractor, then you can call them in to discuss what work you need done.

Getting your roof examined on a regular basis ensures that you are not suddenly faced with a massive roofing repair job. It can be really expensive and the last thing you would want is a crunch in funds.
