Roof Styles and How They Can Complement Your BC Home by Brendan Gertner

Although the roof isnâ€™t among the first things you notice when you look at a house, it contributes much to its overall appearance and beauty. A good roof would complement the image that the house wants to achieve. But one that does not reflect the theme would take away a lot of its appeal. A flat roof on a Victorian-style house, for example, would be a total failure. That is why roof style is of primary importance when you build a house. You have to consider several factors that will affect function and aesthetics. Think about the weather in your area, the theme or style of your house, and the amount of attic space you want. There are several types of roof styles but the most popular are the gabled roof, hip roof and flat roof.

The first, and arguably the most popular roof style is the gabled roof. It is made of two roof surfaces of the same size that slopes down at the same angle, leaving the two ends of the house flat and open. It is affordable, easy to build, and allows for good water-shedding, ventilation, and ceiling space. This type of roof isnâ€™t advisable for high-wind areas though, since it can be blown off easily.

Another popular style is the hip roof which, unlike the gable roof, has no flat sides. Instead it has four roof surfaces that slope down to meet the walls of the house. This type of roof is ideal for high-wind or hurricane-prone areas because they offer better internal bracing and will not likely be detached by strong winds. It is more expensive than a gabled roof and offers less ceiling space.

A roof style that a roofing company in BC can get you is the flat roof. This is a flat cover on your house with a slight slope to help in water shedding. A flat roof is the least expensive of roof types and has the shortest life span. It is however the easiest-to-build or install; but is not advisable for areas with frequent rain or snow.

Whatever type of roof you choose, be sure to work only with roofing contractors BC residents trust. Your friends or family can refer you to these roofers who will give you professional advice and quality workmanship.

Before you undertake a roofing project with BC roofing contractors, remember to consider the cost of each roof style vis-a-vis your budget.
