The Best Kinds of Drapes Used in Complimenting Windows by Roxie Tenner

Article published on May 29th 2012 | Home Improvement

Windows are both functional and aesthetic components of the house. They are functional because they circulate air properly; and they are aesthetic because the design and materials used to make them contribute to the over-all appearance of the house. They also provide a vista with which to appreciate oneâ€™s surroundings.

However, windows are never entirely complete without some draperies to complement it. Functionally, just imagine how hot it would be if there were no drapes to cover your windows from the afternoon sunlight. Aesthetically, windows will appear dull and colorless without drapes hanging beside them. With drapes, windows can fulfill their functional and aesthetic purposes to the fullest.

Drapes are basically long curtains used to dress up windows and walls. The good thing about window drapes is that these days they come in so many sizes, designs and arrays of fabric material ranging from silk to cotton to linen. Because of the vast variety of curtains available, many people get confused over the best type of drape to use. In this case, you can ask the advice of a professional interior designer.

For most people, silk drapes are the best choice because of the royal and traditional look they give to any house. You can add a certain finesse to your house by using striped silk drapes, which when hit by sunlight will shimmer in two colors, giving the appearance that the drape is moving. Silk drapes of the same color or those with a darker hue than the background are mostly preferred because they blend in with the over-all color and tone of the house.

An equally good choice would be velvet drapes, as they give a classic touch to any interior. Their rich color and soft texture can automatically draw the attention of guests. The beautiful thing about velvet is the soft furry texture which you can feel when you run your hands over it. This is made possible because of the soft deep pile on the surface of velvet. Itâ€™s no surprise then that the custom drapes Philadelphia residents usually prefer are made of velvet.

Velvet drapes would be an excellent choice if you live in a place where heat is really important. The thickness allows it to be able to keep heat in while keeping the cold out. Velvets also make excellent materials for upholstery. That is why in terms of upholstery Philadelphia residents usually choose velvet.

If you think your windows lack color and style, trying out the custom drapes Philadelphia residents use to decorate their homes might prove helpful. You can learn more information about drapes on howstuffworks.com.

Article Source:
http://www.articleside.com/home-improvement-articles/the-best-kinds-of-drapes-used-in-complimenting-windows.htm - Article Side

Roxie Tenner - About Author:
For more details, search a custom drapes Philadelphia and a upholstery Philadelphia in Google for related information.

Article Keywords:
custom drapes philadelphia, upholstery philadelphia

You can find more free articles on Article Side. Sign up today and share your knowledge to the community! It is completely FREE!