Article Side

The Different Vinyl Siding Styles for Your Home

by William Gulliver

Article published on February 28th 2012 | Home Improvement

The use of vinyl siding is becoming an even more popular choice among homeowners today because of the different styles introduce into the market each year. When choosing a style, consider which fits your home's architectural style and your budget. Read on to see different vinyl siding styles that you can use for your home.

Traditional Lap

This is vinyl siding at its most basic style. Many of vinyl siding styles are taken from wood siding styles. With the traditional lap style, each vinyl panel overlaps each other horizontally, just like traditional wood panels.

Dutch Lap

The Dutch lap style appears similar to traditional vinyl siding, except for the added groove at the top of the board, giving it a more sophisticated look. Instead of being cut into perfect rectangles like regular vinyl siding, Dutch lap siding is beveled or tapered. However, the added groove is not just for show: it actually increases the strength of the siding.

Board and Batten

The board and batten style uses wide and narrow vertical vinyl boards that are alternated along the width of the siding. This vinyl siding style is most often seen in historical barns and homes, associating it with the rustic style common to them. The unique look offered by the board and batten style makes it popular among homeowners. If you are remodeling your home and wants to achieve a specific rustic look, then the board and batten style is definitely useful. Check out the vinyl siding New Jersey has.

Beaded

The beaded vinyl siding style has textured surface due to the bead that runs the length of the board. This half-round molding effect at the bottom of board gives it more depth, dimension, and shadow than the regular vinyl siding cut. Because of this, it is often used to replace siding for older and more traditional looking homes. If you want your home to resemble the look of Southern Colonial houses, then beaded style vinyl siding NJ offers is the way to go.

Scallops and shakes

These two other different vinyl siding styles take after the wood siding styles. The scallop-style vinyl siding features rounded bottom edges in overlapping rows. The distinctive scallop design of this style gives your home a Victorian look. On the other hand, the shake vinyl siding style imitates the look of cedar wood siding. The staggered edge of a shake vinyl board evokes the rugged look of New England homes. The versatility of vinyl siding New Jersey can offer will give you more options in your home remodeling project.

Article Source:
http://www.articleside.com/home-improvement-articles/the-different-vinyl-siding-styles-for-your-home.htm - Article Side

William Gulliver - About Author:
For more details, please search a vinyl siding New Jersey and a vinyl siding NJ in Google.

Article Keywords:
vinyl siding new jersey, vinyl siding nj

You can find more free articles on Article Side. Sign up today and share your knowledge to the community! It is completely FREE!